Witch exorcisms and treacherous cultural boundaries

(Video footage is at the end of the post. An online reader on my part is now connected. The video should be public.)

Trying to convey cultural differences accurately can be treacherous when a reporter goes from one nation of a city to another. Going further around the world, then, can mean ethical considerations for a reporter.

Such is the case with this post. One of my fellow students, Laura Thomas, is writing about witchcraft. By chance, she connected with a well-known herbalist in Accra, Waka Kumi, who sells herbal remedies, exorcism potions, and more perhaps more surprising, diets with vitamins and spirits. Kumi invited the student to a ceremony where he and his assistants would cure people of curses and attempt to expel spirits from the afflicted, and he said he was going to film it for the camera.

No, I got invited to a witch exorcism. Follow the jump for more, including video footage.

The ceremony was one of the most confusing things I've seen. Not because it was hard to tell what was happening, although it wasn't too easy, more so that the ceremony was in Twi, a middle-south regional language, but because the ceremony didn't fit into any of the cultural studies or media I have up until now.
